

More new EdChoice expansion vouchers are going to parents with an annual income over $150,000 than those with an income less than $120,000.

What happened to the voucher sales pitch that vouchers are essential to rescue poverty kids from poverty-stricken school districts?

The very idea of a state policy that would rescue a few kids from poverty-stricken districts is repugnant. If a district is low performing, the state should find a way to fix it—for all students—not just rescue a few kids.,

Additionally, the “rescue policy” is seriously flawed in that voucher students do less well academically than their peers in the district schools.
